NEW YORK, NY

SOMERSET CO., PA

ARLINGTON, VA

I was 23 and in my first year of teaching and split between Walnut Springs and Westerville North. As I was walking out of Walnut, a teacher stopped me and said, "Something bad has happened in New York. A plane hit the World Trade Center." I went to my apartment for lunch and turned on the TV just after the second plane hit and watched in horror as the towers collapsed. I listened to Bush's address from Florida on the radio as I drove to North. There was an eerie silence when I walked in, and students and staff both huddled around TVs in the Media Center. The next day, and after being up all night watching news coverage, I wrote the word "INFAMY" across the chalkboard. Before I faced the class, I said, "Does anyone have any questions?" When I turned around, every single student had a hand up. It was baptism by fire for me as a first-year teacher - they don't exactly teach you in "teacher school" how to handle America's worst terrorist attack. There was no "go-to" manual. Lesson plans were scrapped for weeks, and we talked students through their emotions, which ran the gauntlet from fear to depression to outright anger. We lived that history together as a class, as a school, and as a country. No one will ever forget that.

SEPTEMBER 11, 2001:

Welles Crowther (“Man in the Red Bandana”) was an equities trader in the South Tower. He saved 18 people by rushing UP the stairs to help the wounded. He died when the South Tower collapsed. He was just 24.
